00:02- 00:14 it was the day after the volcanic eruption that happened on May 22 this year, very early in the morning, there was misinformation circulating on social medias.

00:15 - 00:29 there were people who shared images of volcanic eruptions that took place in past years, and others who shared eruptions that took place in other countries

00:30- 00:45 as a journalist who was there, it was my responsibility to share the real information. So I took my camera, went to the scene and started taking pictures

00:47- 01:02 what I remember when I was there was this heat and also this steam coming from the cooling lava

01:03- 01:15 and also there were several people, especially the young people, who were taking pictures, who were taking selfies. In any case it was chaos but the scene was also interesting

01:16- 01:24 it was an opportunity for me to take these images and share them with the entire world

01:26- 1:40 my approach to taking these pictures was to show the emotion, the way the community was reacting to the incident that had just happened

01:41- 1:53 and feeling that emotion. That's why I took these pictures

01:56- 02:10 the moment that I was trying to capture was that excitement, it was all that was going on at that moment

02:11- 02:25 the goal was to take these actions and show these young people who were not afraid

02:26- 02:40 to walk on the lava that was still hot and to take pictures, in any case it was this scene, these moments that I wanted to show

02:41- 2:51 what motivates me to continue taking pictures is that I can immortalize the moment with my camera

02:52- 03:02 so the fact that I can immortalize what's happening in my community and that it's going to last for years and it's going to create a historical moment

03:03- 03:17 whether it's for my community, my country or the world, that's what really motivates me to continue with photography

03:19- 03:32 what I like most about photography is that I can closely follow what's going on with my camera

03:33- 03:44 I preserve that important moment and that I can immortalize that moment and that I can share it with the one who doesn't have it

03:45- 3:51 so this is what makes me really love photography, Thank you
